

Abuse may be physical, sexual, emotional or psychological. It may be related to a person's age, sex, race, gender assignment, sexual orientation, religion or similar belief, disability, marital or civil partnership status, or pregnancy or maternity, and may be financial, institutional in nature. It includes both self-neglect and neglect by others.

Active participation is a way of working that recognises an individual's right to participate in the activities and relationships of everyday life as independently as possible. The individual is regarded as an active partner in their own care or support, rather than as a passive recipient. Ways to support active participation may

This includes verbal and non-verbal communication such as signs, symbols, pictures, writing, objects of reference, human and technical aids, eye contact, body language and touch. Communication may take place face to face, by telephone, email, text, via social networks, written reports and letters.

This is the way in which a worker continues to learn and develop throughout their career, keeping their skills and knowledge up to date and ensuring they can work safely and effectively.

A difficult situation or problem where there are conflicting concerns.

Celebrating differences and valuing everyone. Diversity encompasses visible and non-visible individual differences and is about respecting those differences.

Your duty of care means that you must aim to provide high quality care to the best of your ability and say if there are any reasons why you may be unable to do so.

Being equal in status, rights, and opportunities.

(in relation to workers) The essential elements of literacy, numeracy and communication skills you need to perform your work confidently and effectively.

This includes recording them.

Harm includes ill treatment (including sexual abuse, exploitation and forms of ill treatment which are not physical); the impairment of health (physical or mental) or development (physical, intellectual, emotional, social or behavioural); self-harm and neglect; unlawful conduct which adversely affects a person's property, rights or interests (for example, financial abuse).

This applies to the safety of yourself, your colleagues and the people you support.

These include any clinical procedures carried out as part of a care or support plan, for example those relating to stoma care, catheter or injections.

Ensuring that people are treated equally and fairly and are included as part of society.

Supporting individuals to exercise their choices and rights, recognising the balance between managing risk and enabling independence, choice and control.

This is often referred to as 'moving and handling' in health and 'moving and positioning' in social care.

Assessed needs can include a variety of physical, mental health, emotional, social, spiritual, communication, learning, support or care needs. For example, your own colleagues and other professionals across health and social care.

For example, your own colleagues and other professionals across health and social care.

Yours may have a different name, but it will record information such as agreed objectives for development, proposed activities to meet those objectives and timescales for review.

These include individuality, independence, privacy, partnership, choice, dignity, respect and rights.

This is the process of thinking about every aspect of your work, including identifying how and where it could be improved.

This includes the recording of adverse events, incidents, confrontations, errors and issues.

This includes both manual and electronic systems.

This refers to the practices undertaken by people towards maintaining health and wellbeing and managing their own care needs. It has been defined as: "the actions people take for themselves, their children and their families to stay fit and maintain good physical and mental health; meet social and psychological needs; prevent illness or accidents; care for minor ailments and long-term conditions; and maintain health and wellbeing after an acute illness or discharge from hospital." (

, published by Department of Health, 2005

(reviewed 2013).

Services may include translation, interpreting, speech and language therapy and advocacy services, as well as social care and health services.

(for workers) These may include formal or informal support, supervision and appraisal.

These may include codes of conduct and practice, regulations, registration requirement (quality standards), National Occupational Standards and the Human Rights Act.

While stress can have positive as well as negative effects, but in this document the word is used to refer to negative stress.

A person's wellbeing may include their sense of hope, confidence and self-esteem, their ability to communicate their wants and needs, to make contact with others, to show warmth and affection, and to experience and show pleasure or enjoyment.

Whistleblowing is when a worker reports suspected wrongdoing at work. Officially this is called 'making a disclosure in the public interest' and may sometimes be referred to as 'escalating concerns.' You must report things that you feel are not right, are illegal or if anyone at work is neglecting their duties. This includes when someone's health and safety is in danger; damage to the environment; a criminal offence; that the company is not obeying the law (like not having the right insurance); or covering up wrongdoing.